Vandals spray-paint prehistoric rock art in Red Rock Canyon

ANTON/LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL

Vandals spray-painted this graffiti on a rock near the Lost Creek trail at Red Rock Canyon National Conservation Area. Archaeologist Mark Boatwright called it "the most severe damage to archaeological resources we've seen in Red Rock for several years." » Buy this photo

Woody Smith paused Monday to admire the view as he walked past a manzanita shrub on Red Rock Canyon's Lost Creek trail only to see the sight that vandals had left: 2-foot-tall letters, "NHC," glaring in maroon spray paint near the top of a beige boulder.

"Oh my God," he said, gazing at the gaudy sight with his wife, Kathy, and their friend Linda Glanister. "That's terrible. There's all that beauty and some knucklehead comes along."

That "knucklehead," who marred the visit the Smiths had made from Lake Orion, Mich., to the scenic national conservation area west of Las Vegas, left other damage to the pristine rock shelter, including a name, "Pee Wee Rodo," and the words "Nevada Has Cronic."

Red Rock Canyon petroglyphs vandalized

In yet another act of idiocy, vandals have spray-painted graffiti on prehistoric rock art in Nevada’s Red Rock Canyon.

Woody Smith paused Monday to admire the view as he walked past a manzanita shrub on Red Rock Canyon’s Lost Creek trail only to see the sight that vandals had left: 2-foot-tall letters, “NHC,” glaring in maroon spray paint near the top of a beige boulder.

“Oh my God,” he said, gazing at the gaudy sight with his wife, Kathy, and their friend Linda Glanister. “That’s terrible. There’s all that beauty and some knucklehead comes along.”

That “knucklehead,” who marred the visit the Smiths had made from Lake Orion, Mich., to the scenic national conservation area west of Las Vegas, left other damage to the pristine rock shelter, including a name, “Pee Wee Rodo,” and the words “Nevada Has Cronic.”

In all, three prehistoric rock art panels were vandalized with the same maroon spray-painted graffiti.

Archaeologists think Southern Paiutes made cultural paintings, or pictographs, there centuries ago until as recently as the 1800s.

One rock art panel that was vandalized contains a petroglyph, or stone etching, that depicts a figure similar to an arched window divided into six sections.

Actually, the image at the top of this blog to me is quite impressive and nice. It shows a massive amount of work, planning, and artistic creativity.

In addition, my first thought was “wow, it’s just like the petroglyphs”. I mean, it is writing on the side of a rock wall. In fact, one could argue that this new version is better than the older version. For example, in our times when concerns for “the planet” are constantly talked about, let’s take the two sets of petroglyphs. The first one, have lasted a long time, they did permanant damage to the environment. While the second, will probably erode in 100 years, leaving a much lighter footprint.

It is interesting that nobody has explored the commonality between these two sets of petroglyphs. In fact, once could argue that the artist was specifically making an environmental statement. For example, he was bringing the world attention to a former culture that was not respectful of the planet and had made a permanent adjust to the environment, but making a less permanent exact same art style right over them.

Cheers! RichGriese@gmail.com
